BETTER MARKET FOR COD OIL

(Special to the Times).

Washington, August 14. — Here's good news for New England commercial fishermen and for children throughout the United States! Imports of cod-liver oil into this country during the last five years have showed a steady decline, and are now only about half as large as they were in 1928, according to figures compiled by the commerce department's chemical division.

This means a better market for cod liver oil produced from cod caught by New England fishermen, and it means a lot fewer puckered lips and squinty faces made by children after that big tablespoon after dinner!

In 1932, total imports of cod liver oil amounted to only 1,248,000 gallons, as compared to about 2,500,000 gallons in 1928. The decrease in the dollar-value of these imports is even more striking, declining from $2,517,000 in 1928 to $804,000 in 1932.

Explaining the decline, the division says that while it is chiefly due to prevailing economic conditions, recent production in this country of various vitamin concentrated products undoubtedly has played a part in bringing about the decrease.

Portland Fish News.

In from a two weeks' trip between the northeast peak of Georges and the southeast peak of Brown's Bank, the Gloucester schooner American, Capt. Simon Theriault, arrived at Portland Sunday afternoon and tied up at the Portland Fish company plant to take out 15,000 pounds of halibut, 12 swordfish, 10,000 pounds of salt fish and 10,000 pounds of fresh groundfish. Capt. Theriault reported that the fish are very scarce and said the weather has been the worst August weather he ever has seen on the banks, with fog settling in nearly every day. Several sword-fishing vessels, after nearly three weeks on the grounds, have reported very poor luck, Capt. Theriault said. The American will sail this morning in return to Brown's Bank.

The seiner Lark, Capt. George Wright of Bristol put in at Portland Sunday with 25,000 pounds of mackerel for cold storage at the Central wharf cold storage plant.
